Jewish Population in the United States, 1983

THE JEWISH POPULATION in the United States in 1983 is estimated to be 5.728 million.

Because community estimates are derived by establishing the number of households (identified through a Jewish member), and then multiplying this number by an average size of household figure, the resulting estimates—as well as the national total—include non-Jews. The 1970 National Jewish Population Study (NJPS) found the proportion of non-Jews to be seven per cent of the total number of individuals in households containing at least one Jewish member. If seven per cent is assumed for the current national total, (and a recent New York City survey supports this assumption), the number of individuals in 1983 who identify themselves as Jewish would be 5.327 million.

The state and regional totals shown in Table 1 and Table 2 are derived by summing individual community estimates, shown in Table 3, and then making three adjustments. First, communities of less than 100 are added. Second, duplications within states (e.g. Los Angeles includes a portion of Ventura County as part of its total) are eliminated. Third, communities falling within two or more states (e.g. Washington, D.C. and Kansas City, Missouri) are distributed accordingly.

The largest proportion of Jews (two-thirds) still resides in the Northeast and the North Central states. However, a shift to the South and West, following general population trends, is evident. Table A indicates that the proportion of the total Jewish population residing in the Northeast and the North Central states declined from 72.7 per cent in 1974 to 66.1 per cent in 1983. Concomitantly, the South and West showed an increase from 27.3 per cent to 34.0 per cent. Since the size of the Jewish population in the United States has been at a plateau for the past decade, these proportionate shifts involve a shift in actual numbers as well.
